CANADIAN WOMEN'S WORK

Just now the trains are filled with travellers, most of them on pleasure bent, and all along the way their journey is brightened by the gardens at the railway stations. Coming from Ottawa, at Smith's Falls and at Perth the C.P.R. gardens are gay with flowers and at Vicborne, where you change for Kingston, the perennial phlox is in a glorious showing. If you come on to the garrison city at the foot of the great lakes, you will see the garden that so charmed Lady Byng of Vimy that she gave the gardener some of the roots and seeds from her garden at Government House, Ottawa, and he returned the compliment with a box of the blooms of the iris she so much admired and a few of the bulbs. But it is not only in eastern Canada that the C.P.R. makes a picture at each station for train-weary travellers. Up in Norther nOntario, where the miners have thrown up piles of earth and the landscape for miles is a barren one, you come to the station at Cochrane and in a border around the only bit of grass you have seen for miles, are the gay painted faces of pansies, nearly three inches across. Such pansies as we do not see in the south. Some few years ago the national railways took the Canadian Women's Press Club, formed under the kindly ewe of the late Lucy Cleaver Ham, president of the C.P.R., to Vancouver for its triennial meeting. Here Col. Ham, "the Father of the Press Club," met the women journalists and those who were there, amongst whom was "Lucinda," to remember the wonderful kindness of the man who has since passed on. The garden of the Empress Hotel at Victoria, where roses grow out of reach and flowers unknown to us in the east thrive, is one of the wonders of the west. Coming home we stopped at Banff and Lake Louise where, beside the most wonderful lake in the world, visited yearly by thousands of men and women from every part of the world, the poppies bloom in October beside the eternal snows.

The Women's Institutes are preparing for the exhibition they will put on in the latter part of this month at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto. The Women's Building is set apart for the women's societies and the Institutes have always had a good showing. This year the National Council of Women, with which the Institutes are in many places among the affiliated societies of the great women's organization, which is composed of women's societies working nationally or locally, will for the first time have a space in the Women's Building at the CN.E. in Toronto.

If you visit Trenton this summer you will find a delightful new tearoom over a druggist shop on the main street. It is a charming place. The open windows have curtains of the same chintz as covers the chairs and sofas, and you can rest here and go on your way refreshed.

The women of eastern Ontario at any rate have been taking advantage of the splendid raspberry crop and parties have been at the old haunts during the last two weeks. "You can fill a pail in a short time," said one raspberry picker, "I never saw the bushes so laden." Then in some local cities the blueberry crop will soon come in and the pails will be filled with this wild fruit that is so delicious.

It is not only in Empire Shopping week, but all the year round that the women of Canada should buy in Canada when possible, and certainly within the Empire. But buy for your own town if you live in the country, in your market town where you sell your produce. If you travel around the country you will find that in the small towns the shops are very attractive and the articles reasonably priced. They may not have as many "bargain days" as the city shops, but for the most part there is a good choice of smart frocks, neat children's wear and the quality of the staple articles is good

The Canadian Red Cross never forgot the men who stood between the women of Canada and the German hordes between 1914 and 1918. Last week "Lucinda" was invited to a garden party by the local Red Cross branch of a city that sent many men overseas and has still in its hospitals men writing service buttons, who although able to spend a day in the country are unable to get away from daily treatment. Motor cars were driven by citizens, some of them ladies, along roads bordered by fields of grain turning golden, on to the city engrossed to growth by the heat, past pastures where cows were grazing on the clover that perfumed the air and under the shade of the farmhouse gates planted by those who valued trees or perhaps left by the pioneers. At last we reached one of the locks of the Rideau canal and the most able bodied men went off to fish, while the others lay under the trees and enjoyed the cooling shine and fresh air as well as the peep of one of the lovely Rideau lakes. But the cook got busy at once and built a fire, to boil the corn which is always one of the features of the Red Cross picnics. And the big frying pan that is part of the equipment was brought out, and the sausages, or the "hot dogs" fried by the man who learned to cook in the trenches. The women of the party, members of the Red Cross Committee, did the rest and the call for tea was sent out and heard by the fishermen, who brought home a few fish that the cook put on the pan later. Home early when the sun was setting, we went to the hospital to implement us the men for a few hours, and the evening chill is not good for patients. "Good night, we had a nice time," called our guests and the women who had helped to brighten one day in the dreary years of semi-invalidism, were deeply grateful for the opportunity to show they had not "forgotten he war."

GARAGE FIRES AND HOW THEY START

BY ERWIN GREER

There are not many business occupancies where indulgence in smoking and the thoughtless use of matches are more certain in the days of auto fire, than in a garage. But patrons are inclined to be careless and so, too, are employees. Constant handling of gasoline tends to lull inexperience into that form of disregard which prompts them "to take a chance." A worker in a Plainfield, N.J., garage, repeatedly warned not to smoke anywhere inside the structure, deliberately lit a cigarette in the presence of the employer, dropping the match on the floor where it ignited a pool of gasoline. The flames spread almost instantly throughout the building, which was completely destroyed.

While the habits of employees are or should be under the direct control of the garage owner or manager, those of patrons are not so easily supervised. The motorist, bearing every outward appearance of intelligence underlook in a Sheepshead Bay garage, to investigate by the light of a match a flooded carburetor in his machine. He was not spared to attend the inquiry into the damage which he caused beside his life, $200,000 in destroyed property.

Matches in and about garages have, however, a formidable rival in open lights as illuminants to "light the way of fools along the path to dusty death." Holding a lighted lantern while peered into the tank of his truck to see how much gas there was, a chauffeur made the journey a year or two ago, and likewise caused a fire loss recorded in six figures.

Cleaning a car with gasoline, too, is a practice fraught with danger, because of the vapors released. An Oil City Pa, garage suffered a disastrous fire from this source a few ago. While in a small New Jersey town recently a young garage employee, who had been ordered to wash a sedan started seriously with a bucketful (1) of gasoline, which he was applying freely, when a blinding flash caused by a vagrant spark, suddenly pt a stop to his labors by removing him, the car and the garage from the field of business usefulness.

Oil stoves and other small heating devices, such as electric grills, frequently are seen in garages, they serve to keep coffee hot for car-washers and mechanics on night duty, a cup of coffee or other refreshment. That these appliances in a garage constitute a real risk and should be prohibited needs hardly to be pointed out. The stimulation of this mild stimulant is too keenly felt by employees there is always the thermos bottle to fall back upon.

ENGLAND THE MUSIC MAKER.

British Instruments Go to Every Civilized Country.

"The English are called an unmusical nation, but England makes the music of the world," said Lieut.-Col. R. H. Tatton, the organizing director of the Federation of British Musical Industries.

"British band and orchestral instruments," said Col. Tatton, "go to every civilized country and there are famous orchestras all over the world which British made instruments are used.

"We also excel in the engraving of the plates from which music is printed. This was almost entirely a Continental trade before the war, but work as good in quality and as cheap as anything of the kind which is made on the Continent is now produced in this country, and music engraving is becoming a British industry.

"We export as many gramophones and gramophone records as all the rest of the world. Germany is a good customer for our gramophones and records, and Italy buys more gramophones and records than she manufactures herself."—Tit-Bits.

London's Zoo's "Records."

A python 25 feet long, a giraffe 20 feet tall, an elephant weighing four tons, and an insect measuring 23 inches are among the "records" of the London Zoo.

IS NOT A DISEASE

High Blood Pressure Is Only a Symptom of Diseased Condition of Arteries and Capillaries.

Dr. Charles J. Hastings, Medical Health Officer, Toronto, says that "if we are as old as our arteries is a truism, and hence the necessity of being intelligently advised as to the condition of our arteries."

"Are you too busy with your investments to look after your health?" he asks.

"There is probably no subject concerning which there has been more said and written in the past five years than that of blood pressure. All of our journals and magazines, either technical or lay, have had their innings. All writers of articles to the press have had their say, and I presume the majority of people think that blood pressure is a disease. Well, it is important to bear in mind that blood pressure is not a disease—it is merely a symptom. Consequently we should not take medicine to reduce blood pressure until we have endeavored to ascertain the cause of the blood pressure, and if possible have that cause removed.

"By early recognition of increased blood pressure and the adopting of proper health habits, we can practically all hope to enjoy a rich old age, and that not only for ourself, but we keep ourselves intelligently advised as regards the condition of our arteries, inasmuch as the condition of the arteries large and small, plays a most important role in the development of increased blood pressure.

"Increased blood pressure, as a symptom of a diseased condition of the arteries and small capillaries, which condition has interfered with their elasticity and consequently has materially increased their resistance to the forcing of the blood through them by the heart. Therefore, we have to look into conditions in blood pressure all the conditions that give rise to diseases of the heart and diseases of the arteries.

"In other words, there are but three main factors entering into the production of blood pressure; first, the heart; second, the blood vessels, and third, the capillaries or minute terminal vessels.

"If the muscle of the heart is in a normal condition, and the elasticity of the vessels or arteries, and the resistance of these is normal, the blood pressure will in all probability be normal also.

"As already pointed out, a changed condition of the walls of the arteries is perfectly natural with advanced years, and after fifty years of age it may be looked upon, not as a pathological, but practically a physiological condition of advancing years.

"What concerns us is the degree of this changed condition of the arteries, or the premature hardening which we have already dealt with in a former issue. Hence the necessity for a complete physical examination by our family physician once or twice a year, in view of the strenuous character of our present-day life.

"Over-eating, insufficient exercise and abundant rest periods all play important roles.

"We cannot over-estimate the importance of a proper food-exercise balance.

"The excessive quantity of food that we eat is quite as important as the quality. Hence meals of rich food, indeed, should be strictly avoided. To be temperate in all things is golden, and above all things learn how to worry, hurry and excesses of all kinds from your daily routine.

"Blood pressure constitutes the third of this series that we have been endeavoring to advise our citizens on, that are responsible for the lamentable asserticc of life in the second beween 50 and 60 years of age."

LONGEST BRIDGE IN AFRICA.

Bridge In Northern Nigeria Will Cost £960,595.

A bridge which will take 4¼ years to construct and which when completed will be the longest bridge in Africa, is to be built by Sir William Arrol & Co., Ltd., of Glasgow, for the Nigerian Government. The total cost will be £960,595 and the length of the bridge will be 2,584 feet, or just under half a mile.

The bridge will be a combined rail and road viaduct over the River Benue in Northern Nigeria. This viaduct will bridge the Munshi Narrows at Makurdi, at which point there is at present a mile gap in the eastern railway running between Port Harcourt and Kaduna Junction.

A train ferry connects the railway across this gap, but lately the service has been imperilled by movements of sandbanks.

The total weight of steel work used will amount to about 9,000 tons and the quantity of concrete in piers and abutments approximately 45,000 cubic yards.

COMING :-: EVENTS

THE LADIES OF THE GOLF and Country Club will hold their usual bridge on Thursday evening. Members and their friends welcomed.

A CHILD WELFARE CLINIC for the pre-school child is held each Thursday from 2 to 4, in the Sunday school room of Trinity United Church, under the direction of the Victorian Order of Nurses. 46-tf

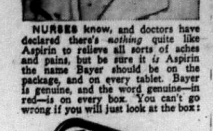
NURSES know, and doctors have declared there's nothing quite like Aspirin to relieve all sorts of aches and pains, but be sure it is Aspirin the name Bayer should be on the package, and on every tablet. Bayer is genuine, and the word genuine—in red—is on every box. You can't go wrong if you will just look at the box:



Aspirin is the trade mark (registered in Canada) indicating Bayer Manufacture. While it is known that Aspirin means Bayer manufacture, to assure the public against imitations, the Tablets are stamped with their "Bayer Cross" trade mark.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

By CHARLES G. TRUMBULL, LittD.,
(Editor of The Sunday School Times).

THE COUNCIL A TPERUSALEM.

Sunday, Aug. 12—Acts 15:1-35 ; Galatians 5:1-15.

Golden Text—If the Son therefore shall make you fee, ye shall be free indeed. (John 8 : 36).

As a lesson on salvation by grace alone this study is peculiarly needed today. For the Gospel of the grace of God is well-nigh lost out of a large section of the professing Church of Christ. Salvation by morality, by high ethical standards, by works of righteousness, by self-improvement, is the salvation that is preached in many directions within the Church. It is no new heresy ; it came during the first generation from that day to this. It appeals to men's pride, as the "offense of the cross" does not ; therefore it is always popular.

The Gospel had been working mightily with saving power among the Gentiles. Peter had used his divinely given keys to open the Kingdom to the Gentiles by faith alone in Christ as Saviour (Acts 10). The great and significant incident of the conversion of Cornelius, the Roman centurion, with his kinsmen and near friends, by faith in the death and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth as the way of life had marked an epoch in the revelation of God's plans for redemption. Paul and Barnabas having offered the Gospel to many Jews, the most of whom had rejected it, had turned to the Gentiles and won many to eternal life through faith in Christ (Acts 13:44-49).

And now certain Jews, either professed or actual believers, went out among the new converts and churches and declared that they could not be saved unless they kept the law of Moses, including circumcision. It is not to be wondered at that this caused "no small dissension and disputation" from Paul and Barnabas. The Church was being divided ; evangelization was being blocked or diverted. What could be done

A Church Council was held at Jerusalem ; "the apostles and elders came together for to consider of this matter." It was a momentous occasion ; the results have vitally affected the Church, and indirectly civilization, for nineteen centuries.

Peter was heard as a witness, and he declared that God Himself had been treating uncircumcised Gentiles, who were making no attempt to conform to the law of Moses, just as He is treating the Jews, putting no difference between them but "purifying their hearts by faith" Paul and Barnabas brought the same testimony. These three great soul-winners testified : "We believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they"—Jews and Gentiles on the same footing of faith alone.

James, the inspired writer of the Epistle of James, presided over this Council and rendered a verdict evidently under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The four verses in Acts 15 : 14-17 are called by Dr. Seofield the most important passage, dispensationally, in the New Testament. A "dispensation" is a historical period of time, or a clarly defined age, during which God establishes certain principles of conduct and subjects people to a certain test, by which they are judged. The Jerusalem Council was at the beginning of the age of grace ; that age has continued to the present day, and plainly, from the Scriptural signs now being fulfilled, we are ves ynear the end of this age. The Divine purpose, outlined in these four verses, is in five great stages, as follows :

The calling out from a lost world of those who are willing to be saved by faith in Christ ; the return of the Lord to this earth and the regathering of Israel in faith in Him as Messiah in their land ; the re-establishing of David's throne, under a David's Greater Son, reigning over Israel and over the whole world ; the turning of all Israel to the Lord ; the recognition of the Lord by all the Gentiles.

There follows the decision, divinely inspired, that Gentiles turning to God by faith in Christ are not to be "troubled" by any requirements from the law of Moses. They were, of course, under obligation to keep from sin —grace never puts a premium on sin, but only on righteousness. And they were to "abstain from pollution of idols.....and from things strangled and from blood" thus showing "grace by abstaining from the practices offensive to godly Jews."

The Gospel has been vindicated. The Gospel means what God does for us, not what we do for God. Men can be saved only by what God does for them, never by what they do for God. Paul's great Epistle of grace to the Galatians is the full commentary on this lesson. He spoke burning words when he said of these Judaizers who "would pervert the Gospel of Christ" that if any one preached an other Gospel to them than the one that he (Paul) had preached "let them be accursed" These were not merely Paul's words ; they were God's words spoken through Paul. And in the fifth chapter of that Epistle he pleads with the Christians of his own day and of toddav : "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage."

CANADIAN HOGS IMPROVING

The quality of Canadian hogs is steadily improving. The percentage of hogs marketed last year was the highest on record, surpassing even the high marketings of 1924. An outstanding feature of the 1927 hog marketings, according to Mr. F. E. Light, the editor of report on "The Origin and Quality of Commercial Live Stock Marketed in Canada," issued by the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa, was a heavy increase in percentage of hogs shipped direct to packing plants. An important feature in helping the price of hogs during the year was the heavy movement of stock for export, the total showing more than 46,000 during the previous year. The origin and grading of the supply as sold from eight provinces in Canada is given by counties or electoral districts in the report, which also deals with cattle, sheep, and calves in a similar fashion

FUEL WASTED IN SMOKE.

Damage In United States Nearly $2,000,000,000 Yearly.

Fuel wasted in smoke could easily pay the cost of smoke prevention, according to a survey just completed by the National Conference Board on Sanitation in co-operation with the New York Department of Health. Damage done by smoke costs each person in the United States an average of $16 a year or nearly $2,000,000,000, the report declares.

The study discovered the annual smoke damage in New York city is $96,000,000 and that in some cities it totals as high as $20 per capita each year. In one it was found a ton of soot falls in each square mile in the central part of the city every twenty-four hours, and that at times the amount deposited runs as high as three tons a day.

Considerable progress in clearing the smoke-filled atmosphere has been made in Philadelphia, according to the report, with the result that conditions there are better than they are in New York city.

In St. Louis, according to the report, a two-thirds reduction in smoke was brought about in one year in a residential area of thirty blocks by educational efforts of inspectors of the Citizens' Smoke Abatement League, who endeavored to aid householders in adopting efficient and economical methods of furnace operation.

In Boston, the bulletin adds, the Public Utility Commission of Massachusetts has recommended a single standard for all stacks and chimneys, except those of locomotives, as a means of combatting the smoke evil. In New York a city ordinance has been proposed providing for the licensing and regulation of all fuel burning appliances.

The report quotes O. P. Hood, chief mechanical engineer of the United States Bureau of Mines, as saying that smokelessness should be the first requirement in the selection of heating and power installations.

What's In A Pipe?

Some curious delights have been thrown on the pipe by a recent inquiry under the British Merchandise Marks Act.

It was stated that briar pipes were imported into the United from France and "finished" by British workmen. Yet, while the turning of the bowl—a highly skilled job, whose secret is carefully guarded by the French—only costs about a halfpenny, when the pipe is polished in Britain and a mouthpiece fitted it may sell for 12s. 6d. ($3.00).

Pipe-making has been a British industry since 1619, but the first briar pipe factory only started in 1879. The early British pipes were all clays.

HINDU SUPERSTITIONS.

Whole Village Compelled to Observe a Series of Taboos.

Astonishing superstitions which exist among Hindus is the theme of an article by a special correspondent to the London Daily Express.

The contagion of death known as "Sutak" may, for instance, affect the whole village, and the village is compelled to observe a series of taboos. When death occurs in a village all agricultural and other manual work must cease for five or even twelve days.

All grinding of grain in the village is prohibited until the funeral party has returned from the funeral. All cooked food lying at the time in any house must be thrown away, as also any water.

No food can be taken except by children, no fresh water can be brought by the women into the village until the body of the dead has been disposed of.

A fire cannot be lighted in the house of the dead, and this prohibition frequently extends to the whole village. Should the deceased die at night, so that an immediate funeral is impossible, it is the whole village and not merely the relatives of the dead that keeps vigil through the night to protect the body from possible possession by the returned ghost.

Community of village life is even more generally illustrated in the customs of transferring evil or sickness of which the most universal is the "chitra" or lifting. There stroolling from village to village in time of epidemic an unbroken chain of mediums and scapegoats, credited with the power of passing on the illness.

Bullock, goat, sheep, and fowl, now decorated, now dragging miniature carts or the images of spirit demons; all these are driven into or quietly deposited within the boundaries of a neighboring village and by this village passed on to another. The chain is never broken except when accidentally the scapegoat wanders into the possession of those who have no faith in its virtue and therefore he solid advantages of an unexpected feast.

A miniature cart about a foot long is prepared in the case of cholera, and in it is placed a symboloof the cholera demon. It is then attached to a sheep which is decorated with red powder.

The sheep is driven over the village boundary and bidden never to return; but sometimes a basket is placed in a cart yoked to a goat and the goat is sent over the border.

CARS FOR KINGS.

One Has a Fleet of Six For a Single Mile of Road.

When some of King George's car were fitted with Britain's last word in engine design, the famous twelve-cylinder engines, recently, it showed what a keen and up-to-date motorist his Majesty is. These double-sixes have such a range of power and air so sweet running that they almost obviate gear changing.

Whenever the King uses a car, h must have a turn-out of faultless lustre and appearance, and his cars are more perfectly maintained and handled than the royal machines.

The royal cars, although necessarily costly, are by no means purchased for, being British and best, their lives are long. In fourteen years his Majesty has only used four different six-cylinder cars for all the enormous mileage of his official travel, including the war.

There is one respect in which the King is more fortunate than all other motorists, says an Old Country paper. It is not necessary for his cars to bear number plates. If you see a car approaching with the Royal Standard fluttering on it, you will know that his Majesty is in it.

At night a unique blue light indicates to the police and others concerned that the large, effortlessly gliding car carrying it bears King George V.

Recently one of our world-famous factories turned out a marvellous six-cylinder car which was a scintillating mass of color. It had been ordered by a powerful Nigerian chief,- who had stipulated that, when in swift motion under the blue skies of Africa, it should resemble a bird of paradise.

To attain this result every part of the chassis was highly burnished. Polished aluminium formed the dashboard; the graceful body was richly striped with red and gold; the springs were colored red; door-handles and the steering-wheel were painted blue; the hood crowning this color mass was like a vivid green sunshade; and the upholstery was done in a lovely blue leather.

The Prince of Wales' visit some wo years ago set all the Nigerian chiefs tumbling over one another to get costly and speedy cars, invariably of British manufacture.

Some of these princes are so desperately anxious to motor that they literally get their cars before they get their roads. One of them, whose whole domain boasts of but one mile of highway suitable for motoring, revices in a fleet of six cars. The highest honor he can pay to a notable visitor is to take him, in a slow procession of the entire six cars, up his mile-long track and back again.

AIKENSIDE

BY MARY J. HOLMES

Author of "Dora Deane," "The English Orphans," "Lena Rivers," "The Rector of St. Mark's," "Tempest and Sunshine," Etc.

When Maddy prayed that he might come and see her she did not expect ah answer so soon, and she started back in much surprise, while Guy came easily forward to greet her, asking how she was, once telling her she looking tired and thin, then making her take the chair he had vacated, he stood over her, smoothing her hair, while he continued:

"I have taken some liberties, you see, and have made myself quite at home. I knew how unaccustomed you were to the duties of a house, and as I saw that there was wholly incompetent, I denied myself at least two hours' sleep this morning for the sake of getting here early, bringing Flora with me and a few things which I thought would be for your comfort. You must excuse me, but Flora looks cold and will soon come down from your chamber, where I sent her to see how you were, that with your grandfather's permission I ordered a fire to be kindled there. I hope you liked it. This house is very cold."

He kept talking on, and Maddy in a delicious kind of bewilderment listened to him, wondering if ever before there was a person so kind and good as Guy. And really he was doing great violence to his pride by being there as he was, but he could do anything for Maddy, and so he had forced down his pride, trying for her sake to make the cottage as pleasant as possible. With Flora to assist he had succeeded wonderfully, and was really enjoying it himself. At first Maddy could not thank him, her heart was so full, but Guy was satisfied with the expression of her face and calling Flora he bade her serve the breakfast.

"You know my habits," he said, smilingly, as he took a seat at the table, "and breakfasting at daylight, as I did, has given me an appetite; so, with your permission, I'll carve this nice bit of steak for you, while you pour me a cup of coffee, some of Mrs. Noah's best. She"—Guy was going to say, "sent it," but as no stretch of the imagination could construe her "calling him a fool" into sending Maddy coffee, he added instead, "I brought it from Aikenside, together with this strawberry jelly, of which I remember you were fond;" and he helped Maddy lavishly from the fanciful jelly jar which yesterday was adorning the sweetmeat closet at Aikenside.

How chatty and social he was, trying to cheer Maddy up and make her forget that such a thing as death had so lately found entrance there; talking of Jessie, of Aikenside, of the pleasant little time they would have during the vacation, and of the next term at school, when Maddy, as one of the graduating class, would be kept in as strictly as heretofore, but allowed to see more of the city. Maddy felt as if she should die for the pain tugging at her heart while she listened to him and knew that the pictures he was drawing were not for her. Her place was there; and after the breakfast was over and Flora had cleared the dishes away, she shut the door, so that they might be alone, and then standing before Guy, she told him of her resolution, begging of him to help her and not make it harder to bear by devising means for her to escape what she felt to be an imperative duty. He had expected something like this and was prepared, as he thought, to combat all her arguments; so when she had finished he replied that of course he did not wish to interfere with her duty, but there might be a question as to what really was her duty, and it seemed to him he was better able to judge of that than herself. It was not right for her to bury herself there while her education was unfinished, when another could do as well. Her superior talents were given to her to improve, and how could she improve them in Honedale; besides her grandfather did not expect her to stay. Guy had talked with him while she was asleep, and the matter was all arranged; a competent woman was to be hired to take charge of the domestic arrangements, and if it seemed desirable, two should be procured; anything to keep Maddy there.

"And grandpa consented to this willingly?" Maddy said, feeling a throb of pleasure at the thought of release. But Guy could not answer that the grandfather consented willingly.

"He thinks it best. When he comes back you can ask him yourself," he said, just as Uncle Joseph, opening the door, brought their interview to a close by saying very emphatically, "if it won't please the Lord Governor to let him spit!"

The blood rushed at once to Maddy's face and she could not repress a smile, while Guy laughed aloud, saying to her softly: "For your sake, I tried my skill to stop what I knew must annoy you. Pardon me if I did wrong"; then turning to Uncle Joseph, he gave the desired permission, together with the promise of a handsome spittoon, which should be sent down on the morrow. With a bow Uncle Joseph turned away, muttering to himself, "High doings now Martha's gone; but new lords, new laws. I trust he's not going to live here"; and for he also thought that the Lord Governor had brought his things!

At this point Grandpa Markham came in, and to him Guy appealed at once to know if he were not willing for Maddy to return to school.

"I said she might if she thought best," was the reply, spoken so sadly that Maddy's arms were at once twined around the old man's neck, while she said to him:

"Tell me honestly which you prefer. I'd like so much to go to school, but I am not sure I should be happy there, knowing how lonely you were here at home. Say, grandpa, which would you rather now, honor bright?" and Maddy tried to speak playfully, though her heart-beats were almost audible as she waited for the answer.

Grandpa could not deceive. He wanted his darling sorely, and he wanted her to be happy, he said. Perhaps they would get on just as well without her. When Mr. Guy was talking it looked as if they might, he made it all so plain, but the sight of Maddy was a comfort. She was all he had left. Maybe he shouldn't live long to pester her, and if he didn't wouldn't she always feel better for having stayed with her grandpa?

He looked very pale and thin, and his hair was white as snow. He could not live many years, and turning resolutely from Guy, who, so long as he held her eyes, controlled her, Maddy said:

"I've chosen once for all. I'll stay with grandpa till he dies," and with a convulsive sob she clung tightly to his neck, as if fearful that without such a hold her resolution would give way.

It was in vain that Guy strove to change Maddy's resolution. She was wholly decided, and late in the afternoon he rode back to Aikenside, a disappointed man, with, however, the feeling that Maddy had done right, and that he respected her all the more for withstanding the temptation.

CHAPTER XIX.

It was arranged that Flora should for the present at least remain at the cottage, and Maddy accepted the kind offer gratefully. She had become so much accustomed to being cared for by Guy that she almost looked upon it as a matter of course, and did not think of what others might possibly say, but when, in as delicate a manner as possible, Guy suggested refurnishing the cottage in better style, even proposing to modernize it entirely in the spring, Maddy objected at once. They were already indebted to him for more than they could ever pay, she said, and she would not suffer it. So Guy submitted, though it grated upon his sense of the beautiful and refined terribly, to see Maddy amid so humble surroundings. Twice a week, and sometimes oftener, he rode down to Honedale, and Maddy felt that without these visits life would hardly have been endurable.

During the vacation Jessie spent a part of the time with her, but Agnes resolutely resisted all Guy's entreaties that she would at least call once on Maddy, who had expressed a wish to see her, and who, on account of her grandfather's health, and the childishness with which Uncle Joseph clung to her, could not well come up to Aikenside. Agnes would not do down, neither would she give other reason for her obstinacy than the apparently foolish one that she did not wish to see the crazy man. Still she she did not object to Jessie's going as often as she liked, and she sent her many little delicacies from the larder at Aikenside, some for grandpa, but most for Uncle Joseph, who prized highly everything coming from "the madam," and sent back to her more than one strangely worded message which made the proud woman's eyes overflow when sure that no one could see her. But this kind of intercourse came to an end at last. The vacation was over, Jessie had gone back to school, and Maddy began in sober earnest the new life before her. Flora, it is true, relieved her of all household drudgery, but no one could share the burden of care and anxiety pressing so heavily upon her, anxiety for her grandfather, whose health seemed failing so fast, and who always looked so disturbed if a shadow were resting on her bright face, or her voice were less cheerful in its tone, and care for the imbecile Joseph, who clung to her as a puny child clings to its mother, refusing to be cared for by anyone else, and often requiring of her more than her strength could endure for a great length of time. She it was who gave him his breakfast in the morning, amused him through the day, and then, after he was in bed at night, often sat by his side till a late hour, singing to him old songs, or telling Bible stories until he fell away to sleep.

Those were dark, wearisome days to Maddy, and when the long, cold winter was gone from the New England hills, and the early buds of spring were coming up by the cottage door, the neighbors began to talk of the change which had come over the young girl, once so full of life and health, but now so languid and pale. Still Maddy was not unhappy, and in the discipline she received, for by it she learned at last the great object of life; learned to take her troubles and cares to the one who helped her bear them so cheerfully that those who pitied her most never dreamed how heavy was her burden, so patiently and sweetly she bore it. Occasionally there came to her letters from the doctor, but latterly they gave her less pleasure than pain, for as sure as she read one of his kind, friendly messages of sympathy and remembrance, the Tempter whispered to her that though she did not love him as she ought to love her husband, yet a life with him was far preferable to the life she was living, and the receipt of one of his letters always gave her a pang which lasted until Guy came down to see her. When it usually disappeared. And he was now at Aikenside, and thus Maddy frequently had Jessie at the cottage, but Agnes never came, and Maddy little guessed how often the proud woman cried herself to sleep after listening to Jessie's recital of all Maddy had to do for the crazy man, and how patiently she did it. He had taken a fancy that Maddy must tell him stories of Sarah, describing her as she was now, and as she used to be when he knew her, but now. "What is she now? How does she look? What does she wear? Tell me, tell me!" he would plead, until Maddy, forced to tell him something, and having distinctly in her mind but one fashionable woman, and as she fancied Sarah might be, told him of Agnes Remington, and Uncle Joseph, listening with parted lips and hushed breath, would whisper softly, "Yes, that's Sarah, beautiful Sarah, but tell me does she ever think of me, or did that time in the orchard when I wove the apple blossoms in her hair, where the diamonds are now? She loved me then; she told me so. Does she know how sick and sorry, and foolish I am—how the aching in my poor, simple brain is all for her, and how even Maddy are doing for me what it is her place to do? Had I a voice," and the crazy man now grew excited, as, raising himself in bed, he gesticulated wildly, "had I a voice to reach her, I'd say shame on her, to let you do her work, let you wear your young life out at such toil, when she is rolling in wealth, and I, who would die for her, am left to the care of hirelings. Shame on her, I say, shame!"

Such a tirade which Agnes pressed that night was wet with tears, while in her heart was planted a germ of gratitude and respect for the young girl doing her work for her. All that she could do for Maddy without going directly to her, she did, devising many articles of comfort, sending her fruit and flowers, the last new book, or whatever else she thought might please her, and always finding a will to do a messenger in Guy. He was miserable, and managed when at home to make others so around him. The weight of Maddy's bearing her burden so uncomplainingly almost maddened him. Had she fretted or complained he could bear it better, he said, but she did not see the necessity for her to lose all her spirit or interest in everything and everybody. Once when he hinted as much to Maddy, he had been awed into silence by the subdued expression of her face as she told him in part what it was which helped her to bear and made the rough places so smooth. He had seen something like this in Lucy, when paroxysms of pain were racking her delicate frame, but he could not understand it; he only knew it was something he could not take unconsidering objection which his arguments beat helplessly, and so, with an added respect for Maddy Clyde, he smothered his impatience and determining to help her all he could, rode down to Honedale every day, instead of twice a week as he had done before.

Attentions so marked could not fail to be commented upon; and while poor, unsuspecting Maddy was grieving so much comfort from his daily visits, deeming that day very long which did not bring him to her, the Honedale gossips were busy as bees were many, were busy with her affairs, talking them over at their numerous tea-drinkings, discussing them in the streets, and finally at a quilting, where they met in solemn conclave, deciding, that, "for a girl like Maddy Clyde it did not look well to be seen so much to do with that young Remington, who, everybody knew, was engaged to a somebody in England."

"Yes, and would have been married long ago, if it wasn't for this foolin' with Maddy," chimed in Mrs. Joel Spike, throwing the chalk across the quilt to her sister-in-law Phineny Marvel, who wondered if Maddy thought he'd ever have her.

"Of course he wouldn't. He knew what he was about. He was not green enough to marry Grandpa Markham's daughter; and if she didn't look out, she'd get herself into a pretty scrape. It didn't look well, anyhow, for her to be putting on airs, as she had done ever since the big folks took her up, and it seemed as though she wouldn't be beholden to nobody for her larnin'."

All this and much more was discussed and by the time the patchwork thing was done, there remained but little to be said either for or against Guy Remington and Maddy Clyde which had not been said by either friend or foe.

Among the invited guests at that quilting was the wife of Farmer Green, Maddy's nearest friend in Honedale, and the one who did her best to defend her against the attacks of those whose remarks she knew were caused more by envy than any personal dislike to Maddy, who used to be so much of a pet until her superior advantages separated her in a measure from them. Good Mrs. Green was sorely tried. Without in the least blaming Maddy, she, too, had been troubled at the frequency of Guy's visits to the cottage. It was not friendship alone which took him there, she was sure; and knowing that he was engaged, she feared for Maddy's happiness at first, and afterward, when people began to talk, she feared for her good name. Something must be done, and though she dreaded it greatly, she was the one to do it. Accordingly, next day she started for the cottage, which Guy had just left, and this, in her opinion, accounted for the bright color in Maddy's cheeks and the sparkle in her eye. Guy had been there, bringing and leaving a world of sunshine, but, alas! his chances for coming ever again as he had done were fearfully small, when, at the close of Mrs. Green's well-meant visit, Maddy lay on her bed, her white, frightened face buried in the pillow, and herself half wishing she had died before the last hour had come, with the terrible awakening to the discipline she was undergoing to the fact that of all living beings, Guy Remington was the one she loved the best—the one without whose presence it seemed to her she could not live, but without which she now knew she must.

With the best of intentions Mrs. Green had made a bungle of the whole affair, but had succeeded in giving Maddy a general impression that folks were talking unduly about Guy's coming there, and doing for her so much like an accepted lover, when everybody knew he was engaged, and wouldn't be likely to marry a poor girl if he wan't; that unless she wanted to be ruined teetotally, and lose all her friends, she must contrive to stop his visits, and not see him so much.

"Yes, I'd do anything, only please leave me now," Maddy gasped, her face as white as ashes and her eyes fixed pleadingly upon Mrs. Green, who, having thus opened herself, guessed the truth, and, as she arose to go, laid her motherly hand on Maddy's head, saying kindly—

"Get over it," Maddy moaned, as she shut and bolted the door after Mrs. Green, and then threw herself upon the bed, "I never shall till I die."

She almost felt that she was dying then, so desolate and so dreary the future looked to her. What was life to her without Guy, and what should she been thrown so much in his way—why permitted to love him as she knew she did, if she must lose him now? Then she would cry; there was a tightness about her eyes, and a keen, cutting pain about her heart as she tried in vain for strength to do what was right—strength to cast Guy Remington from her heart, where it was a sin for him to be; and then she asked to be forgiven for the wrong she had unwittingly done to Lucy Atherstone, who trusted her implicitly, and who, in her last letter, had said—

"If I had not so much faith in Guy I should be jealous of one who has so much influence over him, stealing his heart from me, but I trust you, Maddy Clyde. You would not do a thing to harm me, I am sure, and to lose Guy now, after these years of cruel waiting, would kill me."

Sweet Lucy there was in her heart a fatal stirring of love, and Maddy Clyde might be a shadow in her pathway, she she had never written that to her; but Lucy's cause was safe in Maddy's hands, although for a brief moments Maddy abandoned herself to the bliss of fancying what it would be to be loved by Guy Remington even as she loved him.

She thought there crept into her heart the certainty that in some degree he did love her; that his friendship was more than a mere liking for the girl to whom he had been so kind in Lucy's absence she was essential to his happiness, and that was why he sought her society so much. Remembering everything that had passed, but more particularly the last words of that memorable night ride to Honedale with all that had followed since, she could not doubt it, and softly to herself she whispered, "He knows me, he loves me," while little throbs of joy beat all over her heart; but only for an instant, and then a note of joy was changed to sorrow as she thought how she must henceforth seek to kill that love, for her own sake and Lucy's. Guy must not come there any more. She could not bear it now, even if he never knew had never meddled with her. She could not see him as she had done, and not betray her real feelings toward him. It had been three days since Guy was there, and still she could not, inasmuch as her illness would be a reason why she could not see Guy if he came.

"I can't see him, Flora," Maddy said, when the latter came up with the message that Mr. Remington was there with his buggy, and asked if a little ride would not do her good. "I can't see him, but give him this," and she pleased in Flora's hand the note, baptized with so many tears and prayers, and the contents of which made Guy furious—not at her, but at the neighbors, the inquisitive, envious, meddlesome neighbors, who had dared to talk of him, or to breathe a suspicious word against Maddy Clyde. He would see; he would make them sorry for it; they should take back every word; and they should

Both were found guilty, Baker being sentenced to three years in the Portsmouth Penitentiary and Babcock to not less than six months nor more than twelve months in the Ontario Reformatory.

"And Jesus answered them, saying, The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified. Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground it abideth alone ; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. He that loveth his life shall lose it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal. If any man serve Me, let him follow me ; and where I am, there shall also my servant be. If any man serve me, him will my Father honor." John 12: 23-26.

A BIBLE LOVER.

A visit to a Soviet factory in Moscow, one chosen at random, is especially illuminating, writes George London in "After Ten Years of the Bolshevist Regime." Take their example, the Three Mountains in a recent suburb. This, needless to say, belongs to the Government, like all the principal industries of the Union of Socialist and Soviet Republics.

You arrive after traversing acres of workers' quarters, comprising about 8,000 persons, employed in the various branches of the establishment. There are canvas screens in the lobby. "The Russian Revolution Will Be the Prologue to World Revolution," or "Beware of Alcohol." There is a caricature of Mussolini here, representing him with a knife between his teeth, like the famous Apache of the French electoral campaign in 1918.

The manager's office is severity and plainness itself, its sole ornamentation small portraits of Lenine and Karl Marx. There are telephones, stenographers and clerks. The manager wears high riding boots and a khaki blouse. A member of the Communist party, he earns only 225 rubles a month—double the wages of a common laborer and a third of what is paid the specialists employed under his direction.

The employes in the workrooms labor industriously. Tardiness and inattentiveness are severely punished. As for equipment, the machines are stamped "Birmingham, 1895," and so are more than thirty years old.

Wornout and insufficient material, scarcity of skilled workers and surplus of unskilled labor—such are the evils from which Russian industry suffers, and the official statistics do not try to disseminate them. Last June these showed a 10 per cent. slump in production from the May figure, and in July a 12 per cent. slump from the June figure.

The foregoing explains why the Soviet Government is so anxious to obtain the foreign credits which will enable it to purchase new machinery on manufactured products which cannot be made at home. In this connection the break with England was a serious blow.

At the same time Soviet Russia is obligated, in the interest of the masses, to favor the producers and specialized workers. This creates two privileged classes—the peasant class and the working class.

PRINTS AND FURNITURE

Queen Mary Has Fine Assembly of Antiques After Pursuing Hobby For a Quarter of a Century.

Recently Queen Mary had all the pieces in her collection of antique furniture and all her old colored prints marked with a crown over the letter "M," says a London cable to the New York Herald-Tribune.

Her Majesty had this done to indicate beyond all doubt what were her own possession at the various royal residences and to distinguish them from those treasures that are crown properties.

In addition, Queen Mary has had all the articles in her collection officially catalogue by the surveyor of works of art in the royal household, who has charge of the catalogues of all objects of art in each of the royal residences.

For the last twenty-five years Queen Mary has been an assiduous collector of old furniture and old colored prints. Her experiences as a collector will make an interesting story some day, if ever they came to be written.

She has acquired a thorough knowledge of the different things she has been collecting for the last quarter of a century. Her library of books on old furniture, old silver and color prints forms in itself an interesting collection.

Like most collectors, Queen Mary has made some mistakes. For example, she bought in pre-war days a number of pieces of old English oak of the seventeenth century. She bought these on her own judgment, which was then by no means as ripe and reliable as it is to-day, from small dealers when motoring through part of Yorkshire and Hampshire.

None of them was a perfect piece. All had been repaired—some extensively. Her Majesty later sold them for about half what she had paid for them.

But her collection of old English furniture is to-day as fine a collection of perfect pieces as is anywhere to be seen. One real prize if the collection is a Sheraton sattinwood writing desk in perfect condition. This was purchased on behalf of the Queen by a member of the household in a saleroom in Norwich for £150. The Queen would have no difficulty in getting three times that price to-day.

In some of the farmhouses about Sandringham Queen Mary has been able to pick up some fine pieces of seventeenth and eighteenth century furniture, including a Pembroke table and a work table, in perfect condition.

The Queen does not pay extravagant prices for anything, but she always pays more than a dealer would.

Some years ago—it was before King George's accession—Queen Mary heard of two Chippendale arm chairs that were in a small farm house on the royal estate and which the owner desired to sell.

The late Sir Guy Laking advised the Queen that the chairs were worth £125 each, but suggested that neither in the sale room nor from a dealer would the owner get that price. The Queen offered £250 for the two chairs. The offer was declined, and the chairs were sent to the sale room, where they were sold for £190. After that the Queen could have the choice of anything in the house at Sandringham at her own figure.

Altogether the Queen has about 1,600 pieces in her collection of furniture, which is partly at Sandringham, York Cottage, Windsor and Buckingham Palace. Every article in her boudoir at the palace is now her own property.

The value of her collection has been estimated at about £130,000.

Some of the finest pieces in the Queen's collection have come to her by bequest. For example, Lord Farquhar left her some valuable pieces of Adam furniture, and the late Mr. Sands of the royal household left her a carved walnut chest for which he had once declined an offer of £1,200.

It is an earnest wish of Queen Mary that her collection of furniture should remain intact after her death, and for that reason it will probably go eventually to one of her children. The Queen's activities as a collector are by no means ended. She added two pieces to her collection which she purchased at the recent exhibition of old English furniture at Sir Philip Sassoon's house in Park Lane.

CHURCH BUILT OF SNOW.

Cathedral In Uganda Is Built of Grass and Mud.

A missionary to the Arctic regions recently found the world's queerest church. This stands on Blacklead Island, Cumberland Sound, and is constructed entirely of sealskins. Wood and other building material not being available, the missionary responsible for its erection sewed the skins together and stretched them over wholesome "girders."

Another missionary once built a church of snow, with seats, altar, and pulpit edifice complete. He stated that his snow-built edifice was warmer than most churches he had visited in England.

Among cathedrals, probably the most curious is to be found in Uganda. Viewed from a distance, it looks like a giant haystack, but at close quarters it is seen to be built of grass and mud. This strange building seats four thousand persons.

World's Largest Water Tunnel.

Under Ben Nevis, Scotland's highest mountain, there has been bored a tunnel which, when the scheme is completed, will form the world's largest water tunnel. It is fifteen miles long. The tunnel is part of a hydro-electric project and it will be used for carrying the waters from Lochs Treig and Laggan to a new power-house at Fort William. The total scheme will cost about $25,000,000.

HUSBANDS IN REVOLT

FIBETANS TIRED OF FEMALE DOMINATION.

Men March to Lhassa and Demand Government Recognition of Their Rights — Women Must Have at Least Three Husbands.

There is one country in the world where women enjoy greater privileges than they do in any other part of the world. It is Tibet. But, according to a despatch from the Pekin correspondent of Excelsior, the Tibetan males are tiring of female domination and are beginning to assert themselves—so much so that in one province, Eastchouan, they actually organized a union and marched 500 strong on the Holy City of Lhassa, where they demanded government recognition of "men's rights."

The standard of revolt was first raised in October by one Amouki, a dealer in pelts. In Tibet, woman's power is almost supreme. She exercises a despotism without control. Men, to her, are simply playthings. If she likes them, she keeps them; if not, she casts them aside, and the discarded husband is then an outcast from society.

Every woman is obliged to have at least three husbands and one bonze, that is a Buddhist priest.

All husbands except the favorite one work for the wife. Amouki was not a favorite. Perhaps that is why he became a masculinist. For ten years he labored incessantly, always turning over his earnings to his wife. His work compelled him to travel great distances and he reached home only once every two years. But during these voyages he underwent strange peoples and he observed that among these men were free from female domination. In a few remote instances, in fact, he even found that the shoe was on the other foot.

Aroused by the thought that his fellow men should be subjected to such bondage, Amouki determined to become the liberator of his sex. By dint of much zealous missionary work he gained a few adherents. These helped to spread the doctrine of revolt. They organized independence unions in many towns, and when they felt that they were sufficiently strong they began their march upon Lhassa.

They carried a huge banner inscribed "Striking husbands of Tibet." Each husband carried a placard labelled variously "Down with tyrannical women"; "Men must have financial independence"; "Abolish polyandry"; "One husband should suffice for any woman." Along the route of march the striking husbands distributed tracts outlining their marital views and many a Tibetan woman when the strikers had passed found herself left with only two or three husbands.

Finally, the manifestants reached Lhassa where they supplicated the Lamas, who wield great influence among the populace, to aid them in obtaining their "rights."

But the Lamas were aware who headed households in Tibet. While pretending to listen sympathetically to Amouki and his followers, they secretly tipped off the feminist leaders and advised them to take measures to break the strike. But it was too late. The men outnumbered women and were better organized, and they were not to be deterred by feminine wiles. Finally Amouki, suspecting the Lamas, appealed to the Tibetan Government and declared that unless drastic reforms were made in existing conditions the union members would never return to their wives. Amouki accompanied his declaration with the following resolution:

"Fathers and brothers: For many years we have been subjected to feminine domination. They look upon us as cattle and horses. Their nefarious acts are so numerous that it is impossible to mention them all, but here are some:

"1. A wife is provided with many husbands. If they do not please her, she abandons them. Husbands dare not resist them. That is how the female sex scorns us.

"2. Under feminine control we work day and night in different sections of the country. We gain money by the sweat of our brows. Women never interest themselves in providing us with children or trying to lighten our burdens. If we have not lucrative employment we are scolded and abandoned. What slaves we are.

"3. The women are free to marry, but we are obliged to remain widowers if the wife dies; even if fiances die before marriage the fiance is not permitted to marry. That is why there are so many widowers. The only thing left for us is to shave our heads and become bonzes. We are seven foot tall; must we support such shame in silence?"

The reforms the strikers demanded were Government recognition of the union as representing Tibetan husbands; that every woman be limited to one husband, and in event of death of either, the survivor be permitted to re-marry; that every married couple work for mutual interests, but that no wife impose any task upon her husband in the nature of an obligation; that when the husband has three brothers or less, the wife should not compel them to become bonzes or Lamas; that when the wife violates marriage vows the husband should be entitled to reciprocate; that the husband be given equal recognition with the wife.

These projects are now receiving Governmental consideration. Meanwhile agitation is confined largely to the districts of Lhassa and Eastchouan, but there are vast stretches bordering the Himalayas from Kokonor to India where polyandry continues the order of the day.

HIGHER STANDARDS FOR HOMES

One Million Houses Built In Britain Since the War.

More than a million houses have been built in Great Britain since the Great War. This is a wonderful, an amazing record, when the difficulties of finance, the high price of materials, labor, unrest, and political controversies over rival housing policies are considered.

Striking as this achievement is, progress in the type of housing has been even more remarkable. Before the war it was the well-nigh invariable custom to develop working class housing estates on lines which aimed at regularity and achieved monotony.

Now all this is altered. Local authorities and private builders have recognized the unwisdom of crowding houses on sites 30 or 40 to the acre. The Government led the day, and it is to the credit of Dr. Addison, first Minister of Health in the Lloyd-George Cabinet, that he framed regulations under the 1919 housing act calling upon local authorities not to exceed an average of 12 houses to the acre.

It is also to the credit of his successors, Neville Chamberlain and J. Wheatley, that they decided to give permanence to this striking development, and in 1924 the House of Commons wisely made this rule obligatory in municipal housing schemes.

This adherence to small dwellings and the consequent spreading out of populations has been responsible for an enormous development of transit facilities.

Many estimates have been made as to the number of small houses still needed. A conservative one places it at 400,000.

The housing officers of the Manchester City Council some months ago gave an intimation that they were establishing a new list on a certain day. At four o'clock in the morning a queue began to form outside the town hall, says the Christian Science Monitor. Before the day was out, hundreds of applications were received, and within a day or two the list grew so large the committee had to close it.

Pocket Sundial.

A pocket sundial is among the many curios in the collection at Old Court House, Hampton Court, where Christopher Wren lived.

It had a hinged style with a movable pointer. At the top end is a compass and on the back are the names of several towns in various countries, each indicated by a number.

To tell the time at any particular place, the number of the town is ascertained from the list at the back, and the style adjusted so that the pointer corresponds to the number on the town. The dial is then turned so that it faces north, and the time is given on the dial.

ADENOIDS.

During the summer months, the symptoms caused by adenoids are not noticeable as in winter. They are referred to now because this is an opportune time for having them attended to Adenoids are tumor-like growths that develop in the passage between the nose and throat. Very young children may have adenoids. The majority of cases occur in children from eighteen months to six years of age.

The presence of adenoids usually causes what is apparently a chronic cold in the head, with a great deal of discharge from the nose. These symptoms, with sniffles, occur during the winter season. Cough is frequently associated with the condition.

As the growths are large, the child will be a mouth-breather—breathing through the mouth day and night, because the natural breathing-space through the nose is blocked. This gives rise to snoring.

In advanced cases, the child has a characteristic appearance of the face. The open mouth gives a stupid expression, the nostrils are small and pinched, the upper lip is thickened. The voice may have a nasal twang. The hearing may be impaired. Bed-wetting may be part of the symptoms.

Complete removal is the only treatment for adenoids of any severity.

Parents who have been advised by their physician to have an adenoid condition corrected, and their child should do so. Parents of children who show evidence of adenoids, as described, should have the children examined to find out the condition. The treatment of such a condition is advised because it interferes with the normal development of the child, lowers his level of physical fitness and, if severe, results in a permanent deformity of the mouth and face.

Questions concerning Health, addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College St., Toronto, will be answered by letter. Questions as to the diagnosis and treatment will not be answered.

LIKE ADAM AND EVE.

An interesting insight into the development of Nigeria is afforded by the report of the Empire Parliamentary Delegation, which was composed of Major Walter Elliott, William Lunn, and Mr. Garre Jones.

Discussing the strange contrasts resulting from this rapid development, the report says:

This swift development, which in some parts of the country has simply leaping the centuries, has led to many vivid contrasts.

For example, on the Plateau, at one village we saw a pagan lady wearing only a small fan of green leaves behind, picking her way abstractedly along the motor road. She passed from one little stall to another, carried out her shopping, and with her purchases on her head, disappeared through a cactus stockade to her village nearby.

A few miles further on a sturdy and even more naked pagan gentleman, with a quiver of poisoned arrows and a couple of throwing spears, strode from a rocky path to the road —there to take his seat in a passing motor bus crammed to the doors to avoid inconvenience to his fellow passengers.

All through Nigeria, in the market places, Manchester goods and the appurtenances of ju-ju are offered for sale together. Carved idols, sewing machines, dried monkey hands, British bully beef, yams, tinned salmon, and body paint can be found side by side.

ALPHABET OF TREES.

Near Tonbridge, in Kent, England, there is perhaps the most remarkable avenue of trees in the world. This avenue is nearly half a mile long, and the trees in it are planted in alphabetical order. At present the trees are quite short—saplings, as they are called—and some of them are new to the country; but the gentleman who has planted the trees, Sir William Geary, of Oxon Hoath, Tonbridge, hopes that they will all take kindly to the strange soil and climate, and grow into a fine, stately avenue.

The Consumption of Foods.

According to a statement tabled in the House of Commons the estimated per capita consumption of various foods in Canada is as follows: Butter, 28.54 lbs. per annum; cheese, 2.92 lbs.; eggs, 28.2 dozen; meats, 163.27 lbs.; potatoes, 5 bushels; wheat, 4.7 bushels. Fish consumption is estimated at between 20 and 22 lbs.

Blind Babies' Jazz Band.

Tiny inmates of the Sunshine Homes for Blind Babies in England have their own jazz band, led by a nurse playing the piano. They also take part in drill, dancing, and games.

Heavy Smokers.

Britain's heaviest smokers are said to be soldiers and outdoor workers. English women are heavier smokers than the women of any other nationality.

EAGLES FIGHT AIRPLANES.

The thrill of flying over the Bernese Oberland, of Europe, have been enhanced on several occasions by decidedly dangerous and disconcerting attacks by eagles, says H. Harper, in the London Daily Mail.

Swooping from rocky eyries behind Atheris are huge eagles which seem determined to wage war upon any flying machine which dares to invade their lofty preserves. Not long ago several attacked a high-flying craft. One bird was struck by the propeller and killed, and the impact so damaged the plane that a forced landing was necessary.

In another instance, assailing fiercely by an eagle, a pilot had to dive for the straits he could in a field, and in so doing had to make a rapid and perilous descent. Airmen are being warned of the danger of flying near Dolent.

While a pilot was crossing above the Pyrenees in a flight from Paris to Madrid a very large eagle soared up and flew robbed the plane, and though looking for a vulnerable spot in this strange and noisy intruder.

A movement of the pilot's head caught the bird's eye. It swooped into battle. The airman had by this time drawn a pistol from a holster on the cockpit, and as the eagle darted in he fired at it. He did not hit the eagle, but he evidently disconcerted it, for the bird swerved off and dived out of sight.

In another case an airman was locked in combat at a height of 2,000 feet and they charged. The plane pell-mell. The eagle's right was broken by his contact with the wing and it fell and in a spiral dive was seen sliding down and rebounding and having it stuffed as a memento. Not always are these battles in the mountains in pugnacious mood. Some when they sight an aeroplane seem merely curious, while one, after day has been with a machine for some time, scrutinizing it closely, appeared to the pilot to challenge him to a high-flying contest. Up, at any rate, soared the eagle, and up, up, up soared the airman. Higher and higher they climbed, bird and plane.

But at length the wings of the eagle seemed to flag. Still the gallant bird struggled upward. Before long, however, he apparently reached his limit, and, ceasing to beat his wings and holding them outstretched, he glided silently away, leaving the airplane monarch of the air.

Our Wine-Making Industry.

Canada's wine-making industry is developing very rapidly. From less than 1,000,000 gallons four years ago, the output is expected to exceed three times that quantity this year. Champagnes, Burgundies, ports, clarets, and sauternes are now being produced.

All this, and much more, Guy thought, as with Maddy's note in his hand he walked up and down the sitting-room, raging like a young lion, and threatening vengeance upon everybody. This was not the first intimation Guy had received of the perfidy of Jessie, for only that morning Mrs. Noah had hinted that his course was not at all calculated to do Maddy any good, while Agnes had repeated to him some things which she had heard touching the frequency of his visits to Homedale; but these were nothing to the calmly worded message which banished him effectually from Maddy's presence. He knew Maddy, and he knew she meant what she wrote, but he could not have it so. He must see her; he would see her; and so for the next half-hour Flora was the bearer of written messages to and from Maddy's room, messages of earnest entreaty on the one hand, and of firm denial on the other. At last Maddy wrote:

"If you care for me in the least, or for my respect, leave me, and do not come again until I send for you. I am not insensible to your kindness. I feel it all; but the world is nearer right than you suppose. It does not look well for you to come here so much, and I prefer that you should not. Justice to Lucy requires that you stay away."

That ended it. That roused up Guy's pride, and writing back:

"You shall be obeyed. Good-by," he sprang into his buggy, and Maddy, listening, with head and heart throbbing alike, heard him as he drove furiously away.

Those were long, dreary days which followed, and but for her grandfather's increasing feebleness Maddy would almost have died. Anxiety for him, however, kept her from dwelling too much upon herself, but the excitement and the care wore upon her sadly, robbing her eye of its luster and her cheek of its remaining bloom, causing even Mrs. Noah cry when she came one day with Jessie to see how they were getting on. She had heard from Guy of his banishment, and now that he stayed away, she was ready to step in; so she came, laden with sympathy and more substantial comforts from the Aikenside larder.

Maddy was glad to see her, and for a time cried softly on her bosom, while Mrs. Noah's tears kept company with hers. Not a word was said of Guy, except when Jessie told her he was in Boston, and it was stupid at home without him.

With more than her ordinary discretion, Flora kept to herself what had passed when Guy was last there, so Mrs. Noah knew nothing except what he had told her, and what she read in Maddy's white suffering face. This last was enough to excite all her pity, and she treated the young girl with the most motherly kindness, staying all night, and herself taking care of grandpa, who was now too ill to sit up. There seemed to be no disease preying upon him, nothing save old age, and the loss of one who for more than forty years had shared all his joy and sorrow. He could not live without her, and one night, three weeks after Guy's dismissal, he said to Maddy, as she was about to leave him:

"Sit with me, darling, for a little while, if you are not too tired. Your grandmother seems near me to-night, and so does Alice, your mother. Maybe I'll be with them before another day. I hope I may if God is willing, and there's much I would say to you."

He was very pale, and the great sweat drops stood on his forehead and under his white hair, but Maddy wiped them away and listened with a breaking heart while the aged disciple almost home told her of the peace, the joy, that shone around his pathway to the tomb, and of the everlasting arm bearing him so gently over Jordan. Then he talked of herself, blessing her for all she had been to him, telling her how happy she had made his life since she came home to stay, and how for a time he had ached so with fear lest she should choose to go back and leave him to a stranger.

"But my darling stayed with her old grandpa. She'll never be sorry for it, never. I've tried you sometimes, I know, for old folks don't like young; but I'm sorry, Maddy, and you'll forget it when I'm gone, darling Maddy, precious child"; and the trembling hand rested caressingly on her bowed head as grandpa went on to speak of his affairs, his little property which was hers after the mortgage to Mr. Guy was paid. "I've kept up the interest," he said, "but I could never get him to take any of the principal. I don't know why he is so good to me. Tell him, Maddy, how I thanked and blessed him just before I died; tell him how I used to pray for him every day that he might choose the better part. And he will—I'm sure he will, some day. He hasn't been here of late, and though my old eyes are dim, I can see that your step has got slow, and your face whiter by many shades, since he stayed away, Maddy, child, the dead tell no secrets, and I shall soon be dead. Tell me, then, what it is between you two. Does my girl love Mr. Guy?"

It would be a relief to talk with someone of that terrible pain, which grew worse every day; of that intense longing just for one sight of the beloved one, of Guy, still absent from Aikenside, wandering nobody knew where; and so Maddy told the whole story, while the dying man listened to her, and smoothing her silken hair, tried to comfort her.

"The worst is not over yet," he said. "Guy will offer to make you his wife, sacrificing Lucy for you, and if he does, what will you do?"

Maddy's head leaped up into her throat and for a moment prevented her from answering, for the thought of Guy's really offering to make her his wife, to shield her from evil, to enfold her in his tender love, made her giddy with joy. But it could not be; she answered through her tears

"I shall tell him no."

"God bless my Maddy! She will tell him no for Lucy's sake, and God will bring it right at last," the old man whispered, his voice growing very faint and tremulous. "She will tell him no," he kept repeating, until, rousing up to greater consciousness, he spoke of Uncle Joseph, and asked what Maddy would do with him; would she send him back to the asylum, or care for him there? "He will be happier here," he said, "but it is asking too much of a young girl like you. He may live for years."
